

I think the overall tone appears too much like a powerpoint – I wonder if you can either formalize it more towards that direction or go the opposite route of radicalizing the look of the site.

I'm also hoping that you can use a more diverse set of images where appropriate. For example with the Anatomy section, scientific diagrams or dissecting images could be appropriate and further supplement that subsection's content.

I appreciate the formal nature of the serif text contrasted with the sans serif quotes and silly bits, though I'd like to see that juxtaposition further exaggerated not just in the typeface but also in your use of visual aids, colors, tones, and organization + user flow.

I'd like it the navigation bar was a bit more distinct from the rest of the page – not necessarily in style but consider perhaps how it moves/interacts with the rest of the content?
